Shops are allowed to sell food after its best-before date has passed.

Best-before dates are concerned with quality rather than safety, so it doesn't mean that the food is dangerous if the date has passed

'Best before' dates are about quality

'Best before' dates appear on a wide range of dried, tinned and other foods and acts as the manufacturers estimate of when the premium quality of its product may start to deteriorate, losing some of its flavour and texture, but it isn't when food should be discarded.

'Use by' dates refer to safety

You'll see 'use by' dates on food that goes off quickly, such as fish, meat products and ready-prepared salads. As a result, Approved Food doesn't sell any food that has a 'use by' date.
